Trends in inequality around the world have become a focus of media attention and policy debate over the last few years. From the conversation about increasing inequality that Thomas Piketty's research has prompted to protests against wealth concentration in rich countries, the issue is at the forefront of public concern and the development policy agenda.

In June's Policy Research Talk, Senior Research Adviser Aart Kraay provided new evidence on one of the key questions in the debate: how much do trends in inequality matter for changes in social welfare?

Towards a circular economy: A zero waste programme for Europe

Moving towards a more circular economy is essential to deliver the resource efficiency agenda established under the Europe 2020 Strategy for smart, sustainable and inclusive growth. Higher and sustained improvements of resource efficiency performance are within reach and can bring major economic benefits.

Circular economy systems keep the added value in products for as long as possible and eliminates waste.

Transition to a more circular economy requires changes throughout value chains, from product design to new business, market models, from new ways of turning waste into a resource to new modes of consumer behaviour.

EU utilities to be negatively affected by low energy prices until 2020

Low wholesale power prices will make Europe's utilities suffer, corroding their revenues until the end of the decade since increasing renewable production and low demand integrate. Europe's electricity generators have been pressurized by the development of renewable energy, which is causing overcapacity, eroding prices, while productive coal-fired power stations are obliged to shut down under European climate protection regulations.
